"destiny, it will come naturally and logically." The Japanese Government may be willing to recognize the dominant influence of the United States, but it will certainly not be willing to see its own subjects treated as a proscribed race. For the last few years there has been a steady stream of emigration from Japan to Hawaii and Japan rightly considers that she has acquired large interests in the islands. If the Hawaiian Republic continues to stand alone Japan will almost certainly insist on her subjects being treated on an equality with those of other nations. If, on the other hand, annexation to the United States should take place it is just possible she might acquiesce in some restriction on Japanese immigration as a condition of treaty revision, though she would necessarily do so very unwillingly. But to exclude the Japanese from Hawaii would seriously retard the material development of that country, whose planting industry imperatively calls for a cheap and plentiful supply of labour. The Japanese hitherto have proved a useful and acceptable addition to the population, free from most of the objections supposed to attach to Chinese immigrants. Having regard to the climate it seems vain to hope that planting enterprise could be satisfactorily carried on with European labour, and the exclusion of Japanese immigration would therefore be a severe blow to the prosperity of the islands.
